At Ottawa

BY SARAH DUDLEY P. JONES. Sycamore, Illinois,

But yesterday the free winds play, O'er the prairie wild, unclaimed, un-

Through forests, that the light of day Had pierced not since creation's morn; In this same path which waves have worn Through limestone bed, and yielding clay.

These rivers twain haste to their bourne From Ottawa.

That near past seems to touch us here; To be but part of all we see: That engine's shrick, loud, shrill and clear Seems the wild whoop of savagery, Where bends that drooping, wave swept

Should swift canoe dart out-away-Part of the spell it would appear At Ottawa.

The red man's trail is all around; His foot prints light pass not away ; Embalmed in every name and sound, Today we tread in the hunting ground Of Illinois and Pottawattomie; Seek the lone rock their death doom found. Near Ottawa. Old friend that wandered by my side,

Your words unheeded passed by me, As listening to that rippling tide In fancy's realm my senses gilde, Hear sounds, see scenes long passed away Low cactus studs thy arid shore,

Or fertile curves in shadows lie; Or rank growths to thy wave bend o'er Where once the wild deer tracked his Varied the scene, the smiling day,

The sunlit skies reflected pour Into thy depths, bright as of yore, At Ottawa. Here joined to stronger sound and flow, LaFox, my childhood's lullaby, Washes the alluvial plains below, Or miles of forests wanders by From steamer's deck I day by day Have seen the gliding picture go, Stiller than 'neath the red man's sway, Lone, vast, and stretching far below From Ottawa.

And if a race that past in night, Evanishing from light of day, Yet lives, through veiled from mortal

May not some potent influence stay That draws them where their earth life lay ? Then surely from you tree crowned height An eye may look that knew each way That makes this scene so fair and bright
